

Students sharpen up

An incident involving sharps impacted on students at Nowra Anglican School this week.

As part of National Career Development Week, members of the Student Health Alliance for Rural Populations (SHARP) team from the University of Wollongong ran a workshop which opened the students' eyes to an extensive range of medical career options.

Titled So You Want a Career in Health, the workshop involved students in a range of activities from plastering body parts to working on Gutsy Gus the anatomical model.

The aim of the event is to provide students with an insight into careers in the health industry, to allow high school students the opportunity to chat with university students studying health, and to highlight the importance of developing the skills to managing your career.

Year 10 student Sam Hockey said he wasn't aware there were so many choices in the health industry.

"The SHARP team showed the fun side of health careers as well as the requirements needed to gain entry," he said.

National Career Development Week through hundreds of careers events run throughout the year, encourages all Australians to actively engage in career development and develop the skills to manage their careers, learning, work and lives.

National Career Development Week (NCDW) is a key initiative of the Career Industry Council of Australia.

Nowra Anglican School year 10 students Lauren Pickering and Sam Hockey with University of Wollongong student Nick Corr from the Student Health Alliance for Rural Populations.